Fly coffee or drive? The impact of dual-task coordination on driving performance. Two experiments investigated the impact of dual-task coordination on driving performance. Drivers had to respond to displays on the road with and without a concurrent cognitively demanding task (counting backward by threes). In Experiment 1, drivers were required to share only the road display, and in Experiment 2 drivers were required to share the road display and count backward by threes.

Regardless of the conditions, display sharing produced an immediate and maintained decrease in accuracy. Experiment 2 suggested that sharing both displays slowed reaction times in a similar way to previous research using other tasks. The conclusion is that when drivers share
