Avg + 2 * is the Exponential one. I've also learned that Avg+1 is the Linear so they should be the same I think I'm missing something very stupid A: They have different definitions. The exponential moving average is given by $\bar{x}_t = \frac{\sum_{i=1}^t x_i}{1 + \lambda^t}$. However you cannot really define an exponential moving average as a moving average only (this is due to the constant parameter $1 + \lambda$ which changes over time). See also What is the difference between EMA, MA, PMA, DEMA (Exponential) and DEMA (Linear)? On the other hand, a linear moving average is given by $\bar{x}_t = \frac{\sum_{i=1}^t x_i}{1 + \lambda}$, where λ is constant.
