This evidence is in agreement with earlier studies ([@B9]) and proves that BMT is an effective method to protect against diabetes. Diabetes is one of the most common complications of DMD ([@B11], [@B12]). We found that the prevalence of diabetes was 4.7% among patients with DMD when considering the glycemic status in the period before the index transplantation, a prevalence that was 5.7% when considering the glycemic status in the period of the last 2 years of the study. Altogether, these data suggest a good control of the metabolic status of DMD patients after the transplant. Recently, a higher prevalence of diabetes has been found in pediatric patients with DMD when compared to those who do not have DMD ([@B13]). In fact, our data are similar to data from the Diabetes in Early-Onset Muscular Dystrophy (DePyD) study, which bff6bb2d33
