MMS 2 full.Q: Track Requests and their duration We have a web platform which captures the user clicks(requests) to the site.
A sample of a user's activity and requests to the site are seen below: Is there a way to track time taken to process each request? A: There are a couple of alternatives. If you have a large number of users you could use one of the load testing tools like Siege. I think they have an IPC based architecture so it's easier to time how long it takes to process a request. If you want to do this without load testing you could use a simple timer to record the time elapsed when the user clicks on the request. Or as part of the request capture process you could ask the user to provide this information. That would mean you would need to capture the response time as part of the request. So in short: If you have a large number of users you can use one of the load testing tools like Siege. If you don't have a large number of users then capture the response time of a small number of requests and then either use the data for your site analytics or average the response time for all requests (you will only need one sample) for the rest of your users. A: If you use the Google Chrome Developer Tools, you can use the Timeline feature to time the critical request. This is the "pretty" UI you get with the Developer Tools: You can use the top most section to get detailed information about the request as seen in the image below: You can also write the time to a file/variable for each request easily using the Stack Trace "Issue" entries. A: Look up the I 595f342e71
