What's New In?

The present invention relates generally to an eye care system. The anatomy of a human eye is not readily accessible for visual inspection during an examination. The iris is sufficiently movable in and about the pupil to limit direct observation of the interior of the eye. Other parts of the eye such as the cornea, iris and retina are fixed, and thus cannot be inspected directly by any form of observation. Thus, a variety of techniques and systems are available for imaging the interior of the eye. In practice, it is usually preferable to avoid directly viewing the interior of an eye because of safety and ocular health considerations. Accordingly, different approaches have been developed for imaging the interior of the eye. Contact lenses having a variety of imaging devices such as electronic cameras are worn on the surface of the eye to capture images of the interior of the eye. The images captured by such contact lenses can be viewed through an eyepiece or can be stored for subsequent processing. Alternative techniques include using interferometry to capture images of the interior of the eye by reflecting a beam off an optical surface of the eye. Further, imaging of the interior of the eye can be accomplished using an endoscope. For a clinician who is examining the interior of the eye, it would be advantageous to be able to readily observe an image of the retinal surface while maintaining an eye with a pupil open. Such an approach would facilitate the capture and viewing of images of the interior of the eye. There are several forms of examination which involve entering the eye. For example, a surgeon may place a needle into the eye to gain access to the vitreous humor, or retina, or to perform other surgical procedures. Any form of instrumentation which is operated in an inside or non-contacting manner should not damage the eye, or be capable of causing pain, dazzle, or thermal damage to the eye. It is also advantageous for the instrumentation to not create a light reflex in the eye. It is further beneficial if the instrumentation can be adjusted for viewing purposes. As can be seen from the above, there are several advantages to an eye care system that addresses one or more of the above identified needs.2020-01-19T18:46:56+00:00 2020-01-19T20:17:25+00:00.
