Photoshop Elements is a good first step toward learning photo editing and manipulating images with the latest version. Editing images in Photoshop Elements First, let's look at how to use the tools in Photoshop Elements, which is similar to Photoshop.

Basic tools The Paintbrush tool is an easy way to make selections in the Photo Bin window. Select the area you want selected, and Photoshop Elements will automatically fill the area with the selection color and outline it with a box (see Figure 6-6). Using the options bar, you can modify the selection as you like.

Alternatively, you can press the D key to deselect the area and create a new selection without modifying the existing one. Figure 6-6: Use the Paintbrush tool to make selections. The Lasso tool, which is a tool that makes a selection box around an object or image, is another easy way to select a part of an image. By clicking and dragging, you can make very precise and accurate selections. An important difference between the Lasso tool in Photoshop and the Lasso tool in Photoshop Elements is that you can draw a straight, curved, or elliptical box with the Lasso tool in Photoshop, and then Photoshop Elements adds a path from the selection's start and stop points. Layers With the default file in Photoshop Elements, you have a one-layer image with only one layer. Each layer in Photoshop Elements gives you the capability to add another layer to the top, copy an image into a new layer, or make selections on a new layer. If you create another layer, the previous layer is not automatically changed

Q: Raster LOD evaluation of DEM I am working on a raster that has a LOD for every 3m x 3m square centered at a gridded point. My goal is to use this LOD as a mask for some new data. When I perform a LOD evaluation on my DEM, I get the map below. Can someone explain to me what this means? What does the small white areas represent and how can I tell if this LOD method will give me an accurate raster when I use it as a mask in QGIS? A: To evaluate LOD you need to know if pixels in areas closer to each other are effectively the same. The LOD says nothing about how homogenous an area is. So the main thing it determines is whether there is any significant elevation difference between pixels. Your minimum LOD has 0.00003m between samples. This means that elevation differences between the two closest pixels is no more than 0.00003m. This means that the pixels, by definition, are the same. If you get 0.00003m between any two points in your DEM, then the LOD will be computed correctly. The white areas represent pixels that either do not exist (something like a hole in the grid or no data at all) or that are on an elevation difference of more than 0.00003m. When working with LOD data, please be aware that it's important to know what you will do with it - will you intersect it with other data or will you use it as a mask? That will influence the behaviour of your LOD. For example, in your image, if I use a LOD of 0.00003m, I will not get any results from intersecting it with any other data. If I use a LOD of 4cm, however, I will get a lot of unexpected results. Let's try it out: Create a DEM, called DEM1, with a 30cm LOD. Create a DEM, called DEM2, with a 10cm LOD. If you plot the LOD levels you will notice that the LOD of DEM1 is on an elevation difference of
