I have no doubt that AARP members are good members of the organization, at least most of them are. I personally know a few great people who work for AARP. Their intention is to help others who are old to take care of themselves. The fact that they could only manage a 6.9% return amazes me. Again, I have no problem with AARP - they are just not a top fund. If you look at the data, you can see clearly that they are just another fund to own, that has failed to beat the S&P 500. Buy and hold will always beat them. I know I am pushing the envelope a bit here, but I want to point out that a 6.9% return represents an annual loss of 36.4%. That is a significant sum of money if you are retired on a fixed or deferred annuity. I hear a lot of complaints about the AARP. Many people make an offhand comment about why they don't buy AARP. They don't like their past performance. Well, if they don't like how they performed, then they are not using the information properly. If you don't like AARP, you should just not buy it, even if you are a member. We are not talking about a small amount of money here. We are talking about a premium of 2.21%. That is over $4,000 per year if you invest $30,000 for 10 years. The real purpose of this article is to point out how misleading it is to buy and hold. When you look at the data, you can actually see why investing in a top fund like the Vanguard 500 Index fund can be the best thing for your money. This is a simple concept, but most people don't understand it. If you have 20 funds in your portfolio, you will have a 50% chance of beating one of them. That is the reason why I don't play the 20 fund game and limit it to just five fund. Even though the 20 fund game is very easy to play, the probability of success is much lower. The probability of going to the opposite end of the market is quite
