This.The present invention relates to a switchable ultra-small size flash of the kind used for a camera or the like. The switchable ultra-small size flash is mainly used for a compact camera and the like. The switchable ultra-small size flash can be constructed in the form of an integral lens type flash and a single lens reflex type flash. The lens type flash is an ultra-small size flash of the type in which a flash illuminating device is embedded in a planar thin plate lens and the rear end of the plate lens is covered with a waterproof case member. This kind of flash requires a large space for its component parts and also causes a problem of an increase in the weight thereof due to the combined use of the lens and the waterproof case member. Therefore, such a flash is not suitable for a camera which requires a compact and light weight flash. The single lens reflex type flash is a flash of the type in which a flash illuminating device is provided on the rear of a single lens reflex body. In this kind of flash, the waterproof case member has a flash illuminating device and a quick return mirror and its rear face is covered with a waterproof cover member. However, this flash needs a space for the mechanism of the quick return mirror and is required to be large in size. As a result, there are problems associated with a reduction in the portability of the camera and an increase in the weight.The U.S. military's Manned Orbiting Laboratory suffered one of its most embarrassing crises in 2009 when a crane malfunction forced two workers to unload a sleeping astronaut from an unpressurized capsule. In the incident, which occurred during a test in which a worker removed an astronaut from the station's Orbital Workshop, the astronauts' body slipped from the station's locking mechanism, said Space Station astronaut Ricky Arnold, a former shuttle flight engineer. The astronaut, who was identified only as "Astronaut (name withheld)" of the U.S. Navy, was in a sleeping bag inside
